DEAR READER

This book is a manifestation of my current idea's and a general elucidation to what i do and don't believe , the origin of these ideas is highly affected by personal experience , thus none of these idea's is ultimately veracious , rather conditionally and personally accurate .

CHAPTER ONE

I would like to introduce myself and the circumstances of my journey. I am an 18-year-old white male living in North Africa, in a society that is almost modern. Through my experiences, I am sure that I will learn a lot. Physically, I am decent, not a great athlete nor an overweight guy. What is most interesting about me is my way of thinking, which is considered either crazy or traitorous in my region. Psychologically, I have had some troubles, typical for a teenager: anxiety issues and what seemed like some early signs of obsessive-compulsive disorder. I am writing my thoughts and beliefs on our existence, our life as a journey, trying to use my mind in the most useful functions to get to the closest relative truth. This is where my journey starts.

It was a cold day in November 2019 when I came back home after a long day at school to find our car engine working, which meant my family was going somewhere. I got into the car as it was warmer than our street, and my dad joined me. We went to our relatives' house to have lunch with them on their farm, which was a different environment from what I was used to. The family warmth here was at its highest, and we sat on the table, and a plate of couscous was served. Everyone ate except me. The harsh trip through the mountains had hurt my stomach, but despite all that, they insisted I eat. I kindly refused again, and my grandpa looked at me with anger, as if I disrespected the whole family. I wondered why that happened. Objectively, if I didn't eat, it would mean more food for them. They are not rich people who can feed extra people, and maybe if this visit was surprising, the food would be limited, and if I ate, that would mean less rations for them, but they would still insist, and they would get angry if I didn't. It reminded me of how Arabs used to treat guests. In old Arab writings, being generous to non-locals was a sign of power and masculinity. Arabs wanted to highlight lavish people in history, such as Hatim Al Taii, who was known for his kindness to his guests. Generosity is relative, even for Arabs. If supplies such as food and water were always available, lavishness would be meaningless. But in the Sahara, where supplies are limited, lavishness is a great quality.

Imagine if Arabs had unlimited amounts of food and water, wine, and other supplies, and everyone had access to them. Generosity would be less of a quality since food, water, and wine would be everyday life, and there would be nothing special in great meals. Hostility would be lost, and if a society where everyone is rich existed, its standards would be different from what we have today. We may ask what makes good standards and bad standards. In today's stereotypes, good standards are seen in small poor villages where food is enough to feed every mouth, and everyone is living simply eating what they raised. There is generosity, kindness, care, love, and sharing. In contrast, bad standards, such as aggression, selfishness, grumpiness, and negativity, are related to big industrial cities. Humans lived in groups, hunted in groups, ate in groups, and reproduced in groups. The concept of groups brought the concept of "public interest." If a group didn't work together, its existence would be pointless, and groups had to share and be kind to each other to be successful, survive, and reproduce. This explains why almost the same set of standards existed in each culture, regardless of the distances . And like many evolutionary traces , the division between good and bad remained with us .

The concept of empathy emerged with the idea of group affiliation, which is a selective phenomenon. Sympathy is typically reserved for individuals who are similar or closely related to oneself. For instance, people tend to exhibit greater sensitivity towards those who share the same ethnicity or race. While individuals who lack empathy for members of their ethnic group may be regarded as prejudiced, it is important to consider whether empathy is a choice. In fact, selective empathy is a common characteristic of most individuals. As mammals, we tend to disagree with the idea of animal cruelty. However, we may not exhibit the same level of empathy towards marine life, as opposed to land-dwelling animals. For instance, people may find it amusing to watch a fish struggle to return to water, while being outraged by the mistreatment of dogs or cats. Therefore, it is understandable that humans tend to exhibit greater affinity towards their own ethnic group and race.

CHAPTER TWO

" books break the shackles of time - proof that humans can work magic - "
CARL SAGAN

As I observe the city during this still-winter period, I have noticed a distressing incident that has caught my attention. A peaceful young individual was subjected to a derogatory slur, namely the word "fag" in our native language. Although the initial response appeared to be nonchalant, I sensed that this act had a profound impact on the young person. It had, in fact, inflicted emotional pain, which was not immediately apparent.

According to Freud's psychoanalytic theory, every "parapraxis" or "Freudian slip" has a deeper meaning, and it reveals an underlying desire or emotion. My interpretation of the situation is that the young person had a strong desire to retaliate against the individuals who had hurled the slur. However, since the perpetrators were physically superior, the young person was unable to act on this desire.

A more profound analysis of the situation reveals two possible explanations for the young person's intense desire for revenge. First, if the young person had previously experienced non-hetero interactions, the use of the derogatory term "fag" may have triggered an unconscious response. The word could have activated the subconscious part of the young person's mind that associates non-heterosexuality with negativity. This may be challenging to understand, but it is conceivable that a child raised in a homophobic family or society may carry the unconscious belief that being non-heterosexual is undesirable. Even though the individual may have reconciled with their sexuality and accepted themselves, the residual impact of childhood experiences may still persist in the unconscious mind. This event could have provoked the anger buried deep within the unconscious, which the individual was trying to suppress consciously.

Overall, this incident underscores the importance of empathy and respect towards individuals from different backgrounds and orientations. It also highlights the lasting impact of childhood experiences and the crucial role they play in shaping an individual's beliefs and attitudes.

In the event that the person being insulted is heterosexual, one may wonder how a word that is seemingly irrelevant could cause harm. For example, if one were to call someone a dolphin, why would that individual feel bad about themselves if they know they are a human being? However, if the individual is repeatedly called a dolphin with the intention of causing offense, the recurring nature of the act can have a significant impact. This is similar to the Chinese water torture method, which although its effectiveness is now debatable, in most cases drives the victim to the brink of insanity. Thus, it can be concluded that frequent acts, no matter how small their harm, can lead to serious harm after their recurrence.

It is worth noting that there are individuals who claim to be enlightened and never bored. However, such a state is unattainable. Most individuals who claim to be enlightened either hide their true feelings in order to maintain a monk-like image they have constructed for themselves, or, more rarely, they do not experience boredom in the same way as most people do. They may exhibit a state of mind that appears calm, but is actually anxious. They are not concealing pain, but rather transforming its outward appearance.

It is impossible for a human being to reach a level of awareness where the abstract world, thoughts of suffering and pain, and the thoughts themselves have no impact. To do so would require a transformation of one's entire being, and one would no longer be the same person. Although one may strive to come close to this state, it is ultimately unattainable by any imam, priest, monk, guru, scientist, or philosopher. No one will ever reach a state of unbotheredness and pure joy while existing in the anxious world of humanity.

Reading books is a pastime that I particularly enjoy. Currently, I am reading one of Carl Sagan's works, The Demon-Haunted World, which has transported me to a world of spirituality, free of anxiety and immersed in a state of mind and an artificial world. I would like to endorse Carl Sagan's views on books, as he aptly stated

"One glance at a book and you hear the voice of another person ; perhaps dead for a thousand years "

This quote highlights the fact that books can serve as a portal through time, offering a glimpse into the past. For example, if one wishes to gain insights into the golden era of Arabs, such as the Omayyad and Abbasid dynasties, reading books written during that time period provides a virtually constructed image of that era. Each book is like a puzzle piece, and the more one reads, the more one contributes to this image. However, it is important to note that no individual possesses the full image, and with an unlimited amount of puzzle parts (books), we all view the angle of intellectuals.

" books break the shackles of time - proof that humans can work magic - " C.sagan

The maxim "more" does not necessarily imply "better." While reading a greater number of books can certainly enhance one's literary style and writing ability, it alone does not guarantee an improvement in one's ideas. Other factors such as the reader's interest in the book and the intention behind reading it play a crucial role in the process.

Moreover, I would like to refute a popular notion that advocates for reading as much as possible at all times. In the current age, almost everyone has access to literature in at least one language. Consider a hypothetical scenario where an individual reads a thriller book, followed by a philosophical one. If this person is not a fan of philosophy, reading more philosophical books will not necessarily enable them to derive the full potential from such works. Instead, if the person reads more thrillers, they will be more likely to engage with the story passionately.

In contemporary society, it is common for book sellers to propagate the notion that one must read as much as possible in order to become a better individual. However, this perspective is misguided, as the content of the books must align with one's interests during a particular period of time. As David the Caveman once stated, "A person should only read what they desire to read, in order for their brain to gain direct answers they are seeking to obtain. Otherwise, even if the book being read is one of the greatest books ever written, if the reader lacks interest in its content, a fly hovering around them would prove more captivating to their brain than the text in their hands."

The pursuit of knowledge is often driven by a deep desire to satisfy our curiosity. This desire can prompt us to read books that pertain to subjects we are interested in exploring. In some instances, books may even inspire us to ask questions that we had not considered before. While it is true that books may pose unanswered questions, prompting us to seek out additional sources of information, the notion that one should read as frequently as possible is misguided. As we have previously discussed, the number of books read is not indicative of their quality or value. Furthermore, the idea that one should read for ten minutes here or there during free time is flawed. For example, if one wanted to become a movie director, they would undoubtedly watch full-length films to gain insight into the craft. Similarly, it is more advantageous to devote a specific block of time to reading, rather than trying to fit it in haphazardly throughout the day. One hour of dedicated reading each week is more valuable than ten minutes a day.

CHAPTER THREE

SAM HARRIS

Speaking of the importance of reading, it is impossible to disregard the significance of writing, the very tool that has fundamentally shaped humanity. Writing has been so influential that it has even played a pivotal role in religion and history, dating back to the Mesopotamian era. Throughout history, writing has been a reliable source of information and has allowed for more convenient transmission of knowledge.

Today, writing is a subject that continues to garner much attention. For instance, if one's son aspires to write a New York Times bestseller, what advice should be given? Although different people may offer varying tips, a universal rule exists, which is the combination of reading and writing. It is evident that individuals who frequently read have a better aptitude for writing than those who do not.

However, reading and writing alone do not suffice in producing exceptional literary works.

It is essential to consider the author's sentiments towards their subject matter. People may enjoy a writer's style and wordplay, but if they lack a genuine connection to their work, it may fall flat. This phenomenon can be seen in religious texts, where the author's feelings towards their subject matter is critical to the work's meaning and value. The missing component is the author's emotions and their ability to interpret situations to provide the reader with a clear understanding of the subject matter.

In discussing the topic of emptiness and the absence of joy in daily life, it is necessary to address the concept of friendship. Friendship is a social construct that is difficult to define and understand, as it is not readily observed in nature. It is a relationship that involves the exchange of thoughts and ideas, rather than sexual give and take, as is the case with a bed partner. True friendship is characterized by a mutual give and take, based on shared values and ideologies. A relationship that is based solely on monetary exchange is not a true friendship, but rather a business arrangement. Additionally, a relationship in which one party gives without receiving is imbalanced and ultimately unsustainable, while a relationship in which one party only takes is exploitative and abusive.

Recently, a close friend of mine ended our relationship, citing my toxicity as the reason. Despite the end of our friendship, I still care deeply for him and may even be there for him in the future. However, this experience has given me insight into the nature of friendships, particularly among teenagers who view friendship as a sacred bond that goes beyond mere give and take. Upon reflection, I realize that my attachment to this friend was rooted in a desire for the type of son I wished to have, and the opportunity to be the father I will never be. In conclusion, human relationships are not inherently sacred, but rather involve a give and take dynamic.

Although I would like to note that my interpretation of why I love this friend may be entirely subjective, as self-judgment is not always reliable. However, it is certain that there is a reason in my subconscious that compels me to love him.

Let us not overlook the fact that this is solely my personal interpretation of the matter. I perceive all social relationships as chemically and psychologically evolved. The chemical factor takes precedence as we naturally seek pleasure in a chaotic world. We choose only what we feel will bring us pleasure. Following this, the psychological factor comes into play. Our partners, friends, family, and others are significantly influenced by our environment, relationships, and external factors that determine our personality, which we did not create for ourselves, but rather were given.

DR.HARRIS

As philosopher Sam Harris posits, we are not able to choose who we are or who we will become, and as such, we cannot choose whom we love. Moreover, the idea of free will itself is questionable, as our minds and actions are determined by various factors that shape our being. While this may seem controversial, it does not mean that individuals are absolved of responsibility for their actions. Instead, those who pose a danger to others must be isolated, not for the sake of revenge, but to protect society. If we accept the notion that free will does not exist, we can eliminate one of humanity's most destructive tendencies: revenge, which serves no practical purpose and only adds to the suffering in the world.

Funny how most arab goverments function only using this manner , they'd kill a being for that sake , torture and relase most cruel acts on it .

Upon examining historical precedent, it becomes apparent that revenge has been a prevalent means of judgment throughout human history, even resulting in wars. This observation reinforces the notion that humans, much like nature, are capable of inflicting pain and suffering.

However, it would be remiss of me not to address the concept of desire for revenge and revenge itself. For instance, consider a bull fixated on a red flag. The bull has an intense urge to charge the flag, which can be compared to enacting revenge. The desire for revenge is akin to the bull restrained and staring at the flag, while revenge itself is akin to the bull charging the flag. The desire for revenge, absent of actual action, can be likened to carrying a tumor on one's neck, only contributing to one's own pain. Nonetheless, I am not advocating for realistic actions to be taken in lieu of desire, as the consequences could be far more severe than the desire itself. Instead, it is necessary for each of us to introspect, and strive to eliminate this malevolent impulse of revenge.

CHAPTER FOUR

"Nothing can harm you as much as your own thoughts unguarded"
LACHLAN BROWN

"I'm writing this simly because i can't express it in words , it's a very terreftying feeling yet pleasing , on 10 of february 2020 i attempted suicide , exactly on 6pm , i drunk 8 pills of panadol and drunk javel water , it's an irony that i'm writting this just 24 hours later from this experience , i still remember every detail of it . that night i came home willing to end everything , it wasn't a momentary idea tho , i have ben thinking of it for months now , i planned for it the full evening in school ...i came back home and told my sister to bring me medicins cuz i have a head-ake , she brought the medicin called panadol , but since she took too long i drunk javel water before she came , it was disgusting and it burned so much so is topped and waited for the pills , the pills came , i wrote a suicide note thanking my family and friends , drunk he panadole and drafted to sleep , well the pain was unbarable and i once yelled , my aunty heared it , came to the room , and called my father , at that moment when my father stormed i told him that it was an acciednt and it was obvious that

Numerous hindrances were discovered two weeks after the incident. On a typical day, waking up at 7am and drinking coffee, a student heads to school, resuming their routine. Contemplations regarding a variety of topics arise, ranging from meaningful to meaningless inquiries. The irony of forgetting one's own brilliant ideas is not lost on the individual. Once back in the classroom, the philosophy session commences. The teacher, as always, remains non-responsive to the student's questions. Despite the fact that the questions are universal and even the teacher may have pondered them, the instructor may feel inadequate or unable to respond.

The emptiness experienced is indescribable, as the student lacks friends and is burdened by the repetitive routine. Writing serves as an escape from the mental emptiness, but the monotony of life is inescapable. The human tendency to pursue activities that are familiar and comfortable inevitably perpetuates the cycle of repetition, eventually transforming the desire to break free from routine into the routine itself. A great number of individuals have attempted to break free from the monotony of life; the famous traveling YouTubers are an example. Although they purport to be experiencing new things, in fact, they are engaged in a similar routine every day: traveling from point A to point B, and so forth.

There is no escape from routine, as it is an inherent aspect of life itself. To live is to endure the misery and wonder of existence.

unironically stress itself may destroy lives , as i spoke about repetitions , also stress is joy killer , it can drives us crazy but since it's unavailable we shall live it the only solution is good mentality if u could ignore the repetitive event's and focus on the always changing small details you may forget the stress , that's why a student may focus on butterfly entering the class rather than the lesson even if he's interested in the lesson itself , that's why we humans love details , their unfrequenty makes them special to break our routine .

now discussing suicide itself it wasn't a loser move , rather a hopelessness move , in fact a coward cannot commit a suicide , because suicide means that a man had beaten his survival instinct , one of the most dominant insinct in the human mind , when i look at suicide i only see an escape from the unescapable life suffering , suicide is raising the medal finger to death , nature , and the system itself ...since it's that good why are u still alive i hear you saying ? it was the coincidence that kept me alive but now i'm not trying to do it again for one reason , i'm getting the most out of temporary joy's , i'm in experiencing new pleasures , but at some point i will get my sufficiency out of the world , rise my middle finger to it and then escape it .

moving on from this experience i had a lot of misunderstanding opening the door for new psychological explanatory experience ; also another door of the suffering we live in , but first i clear that I'm ready to lose a person than to lose an idea for a person , because people are easily destructible , idea's are not .

Tho this doesn't mean I'm so attached to my ideas , as I claimed this book that was a description of my opinion in various ways may change totally in 10years , maybe next year either , maybe even next month , what I do is search for the closest prescription of truth , for truth is relative , but stays true from any perspective , that's what i’m looking for as a human being .

Speaking of pain , I see expectations as one of the most joy killers , a devilish idea it's , expectations are caused by the evolution of the human mind , a human mind that's rather so powerful that it draws its image on every living thing , we always expect ppl to treat us the way we treat ppl , persay we have person a who treats people in certain manner , person b that treats ppl in another way , if these keep the natural distance that society enhanced , they will fall into the pit of expectations ; " u could of done soo , if I was in ur choose I would do Soo ... "

And so on and so on , we forget I did what I did cause the event happened to me and if u were in my shoes ofc u will do u , the misunderstanding goes on where every one is unaware that the perfected image that's in his subconscious mind isn't the same in subconscious mind of another being ,
So the self constructed idea will always be defended , because of the image of perfection you did and didn't create to yourself .

Tho noting also on expectations , a human worst feelings is the misunderstanding of love , rather the misconceptions about love , if u would love smn that much your mind will expect the other part to love u , the truth tho is different in very hurtful way , that's what we call a heartbreaking event , reality crashes the simulated temple of expectations , the very temple that has most joy in the world per say adding on the " expectations " , it's a totally selfish feeling , in sense like most other feelings , because if people fill our expectations , we will have a more joyful life at least we expect , so the reason is rather personal , no friend gives an advice to another friend just to be better , no writer writes to his readers only so he improves their life , no grandma spoil it's kids for nothing , it's only for personal purposes it's only the desire of creating the perfected image we aim to be , by changing our environment rather than starting with ourselves .
And I'm trying myself to destroy that temple ,for it's perhaps the easiest way to escape a heart break .

Advices they say , like every word we say , advices are highly impacted by personal experience ,and personal desires .

Existential angst about pain.

Abdullah Jardi
Rewrite the next paragraph without changing much but using a more formal way :
Although it all started in the beginning of this year , life is totally now ; pointless/ meaningless , i'm trying to get anyone to answer my quest although i sometimes escape from many irrelevant conversation(where did come from , who created us , don't u believe in god's will) , thus i have answered most of them hundreds of times with various reasonings , it's somehow complicated to understand but , it's also so simple , we live in an experience of pain , it's a worthless pointless experience ,it's unworthiness comes into action when u realise the meaning of time , how it's totally relative , and it's pain comes in action when u miss joy , and joy is totally relative to the person and the pain , thus joy and pain are two connected meanings , the lack of pain is joy , but u can't define pain by the lack of joy because pain is origin , earth was created by huge doom of fire , animals destroyed each other , and cause their own destruction , the universe is all about destruction and madness , thus pain is the master of madness ,concluding the meaning of life is about pain , not joy , we are only the product of a corrupt natural system .

Although the genesis of my contemplation can be traced back to the commencement of the current year, the present moment presents a rather desolate and futile existence. Despite my endeavors to elicit responses to my inquiries, I often find myself veering away from inconsequential conversations that revolve around the origins of humanity, its creator, and the concept of divine will. My responses to such questions, albeit diverse and reasoned, have been repeated ad nauseam. The complexity of our predicament is juxtaposed with its simplicity. Our existence is essentially characterized by the experience of pain, which is ultimately meaningless and futile. The valuelessness of our existence becomes apparent when we reflect on the relativity of time. The manifestation of pain emerges when we are devoid of joy, which is subjective and contingent on the individual and the nature of the pain. Consequently, joy and pain are intertwined and cannot be fully defined independently of each other. Joy is the absence of pain, whereas pain is the root of our existence. The creation of Earth and the animal kingdom was fraught with destruction, which ultimately led to their downfall. The universe itself is characterized by chaos and annihilation, with pain reigning supreme as the master of madness. In essence, the purpose of life is not joy, but rather the experience of pain. We are but products of a flawed and corrupt natural system.

CHAPTER SIX

“There are no absolute truths "
FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE

it's really interesting how we as humans think , what makes us a different species from other animals is our ability to imagine and wonder , they all leads to questioning starting from question like why 2+2 = 4 ending at the questions of existence , in my mind i think every man with clear mind had at least questioned his existence , why when where how , must be asked although the answers are really magnificent , because there's no totally true answer to any of these , we amy come up with either religious , philosophical , scientific ... answers but how is it true ? if i give a scientific answer it's true from my scientific perspective which is based on the common sci/logic , how could i tell it's the ultimate truth , it goes with all other principles of life ...
this paradox on what is ultimately true makes answering this questions almost impossible , but the fact that we all wonder is at it's own an active way to express that we aware as individuals of what's around us , believing without wondering is like someone who eats human phisies thinking it's better than chocolate , because at the he had never to the nothing , as if the question wasn't asked itself . asking without doubting means every answer is valid , as long as it goes with my beliefs . this what form of question some believers will throw at you thinking it's cool intellectual flex they did .

should we question more than once , perhaps we shall , it sometimes seems stupid to ask the same question and expect different answers but not every answer is partially absolute -for there's no abslotue answer to everything -but the factors changing , the time factor itself is enough to change the answer .

"There are no eternal facts , As there are no absolute truths " friedrich nietzsche philosophy itself cannot exist with questioning , altho i may disagree with classical philosophies about truth , and it's completeness i cannot neglect how their questioning created the philosophy we know today in the indirect way i say .

i say also ,direct questions come in other forms , but kid ask the most terrifying questions to a man i'd say , because kids have no sense of irradical fear they will ask you cosmic questions with exactly no close answers even in philosophie , kids do not have this wall of irradical thinking stopping them from saying whatever the funk they wanted because at the end of the day , kids must ask , to grow their minds , but a little piece of advice do not never answer any cosmic question they'd ask because they'll take your answer as a universal fact's since you are the first and the closest fountain of knowledge , so dear parents please , if you do the mistake of bringing some other beings to this land to suffer with you , do not make another mistake by letting them think your beliefs are universal facts and let society deal the with them .

CHAPTER SEVEN

"Pity is a waste of feeling”

are strange animals; we are social, but not so social, we love, but we hate a lot, and death lurks among us.

In these difficult times, heroes emerge, people who are selfless and do good to this world. However, I believe that helping others is not just about having good manners, but it is an attempt to fill a void in one's superego. This act of helping is motivated by self-complexes, and it does not necessarily make a person a better human being. Most donations are a fallacy, and they fail to achieve their aim.

At the end of the day, humans cannot suffer alone, so they make the world a living hell to avoid loneliness. We satisfy our selfish beliefs, not ourselves.

Let me also discuss the idea of work since we have opened the subject of "cash." In today's society, I see work as entirely meaningless, even if you love it. Work that you do not enjoy can have a detrimental impact on your mental health, and it becomes a living hell. These jobs are made for the public, and those in power can always stay the same.

When we speak about doing the job you love, we speak about happiness and enjoying life, but this is not entirely true. These jobs are directly related to "materials," and the material aspect often kills the love for the job, making it like the first kind.

Yesterday, my friend and I went camping on an old building roof in the mountains. The night was moonless, and we lost our way at least five times, and the walk there took us two hours instead of half an hour. When we got to the roof, we knew it was safe, but we still felt unsafe. At 2 am, I realized two things: I was more happily curious than afraid, curious about acknowledging the situation and finding the unknown details of the area. Fear and curiosity are what create advancements. We can see this represented in human babies, apes, and other animals. They fear the unknown, but curiosity can transform this fear into a powerful tool. However, if curiosity alone prevails, it can lead to evil and killing humans for the sake of knowledge. The world already has enough evil.

This is how mythologies are created.

CHAPTER EIGHT

"All ecological problems will have their roots in social problems."
MURRAY BOOKCHIN

When discussing the commune or group, it is essential to have a vision for the future, whether it is for the current or next generation. This creates an ideological gap between the left and right. The primary question is whether we should save something for the next generation, or are we consuming so much that there will be nothing left for them? The answer varies depending on who you ask. The main political parties also disagree on which generation we should focus on when speaking about the unknown future. My opinion on this subject might be unsatisfying for many since I do not agree with either extreme. First, the idea of the next generation for me is not qualified since we have no clue what the next generation is, or if they will even exist. We live for ourselves, and this idea comes from my anti-natalist perspective that I will explain later. As I said, we have nothing to worry about; we do not need to worry about an uncertain future. This does not mean we should act as if there is no future. A simple example is climate change and CO2 emissions. It is certain that CO2 emissions are a significant factor in climate change, and we will discern more climate changes in the near future and my lifespan as an individual. So, knowing that such a factor would contribute to our suffering as a whole, I would stand for stopping it, hence I live for a better future, a future with less suffering.

Here, the idea of anti-natalism comes into practice. There is a set of questions that every human being should ask before bringing a soul into this world. Did I suffer living, and would my child suffer? Unless you have read my book in metaphysical utopian society, your answers would both be yes. Knowing that fact, why would you bring a soul into this world to suffer? If you think it is your biological purpose, I would like to remind you that you are a being that understands nature (assuming so) and how evil it is. You know that the laws of nature are unfair according to our social standards.

From a philosophical point of view, your child is only a contribution to the existence of humankind, which is a contribution to suffering and its length. We all know that humanity will once cease to exist, but my desire is that it perishes with no more delay for our greater good. Bringing children to this wicked land will only make it live longer. There is a Buddhist teaching dating back to 400 BCE that summarizes what I said about the subject: "Oblivious to the suffering to which life is subject, man begets children, and is thus the cause of old age and death. If he would only realize what suffering he would add to by his act, he would desist from the procreation of children; and so stop the operation of old age and death." Set aside the demographic arguments, which are entirely summarized in the book "Population Bomb," which discusses that the coming generations will suffer great famines, societal upheavals, and ecological deterioration.

As a current society, we should think of our greater good, which is reducing our suffering to a minimum. However, it is quite impossible in a capitalist society, where the slogs of 99% build up the empires of the top 1%, and it does not stop at the particularity of these individuals in that society, but it goes beyond. In such societies, forming nations and using their filthy lucre to smash other weaker nations (where weaker refers to substantial economic growth) makes itself mighty and the others frail.

That is the job of capitalism. For hundreds of years in almost every nation where a capitalist system ruled, sources were never as important as currency, numbers, and notes; they were the most important. The freedom of speech would fall of its

CHAPTER NINE

“A debate is like a cock fight”

This book serves as a comprehensive compilation of the author's reflections on various topics, including religion, beliefs, human interactions, values, and other phenomena. The author's viewpoints are presented without any intention of showcasing their dissimilarity to conventional standards, or of changing the reader's mindset, or of immortalizing their name. Rather, these viewpoints are simply ideas - the author's ideas - that are not meant to instigate any disputes or counterarguments. Such disputes are inherently unproductive as they lack impact when both parties are dogmatically fixed in their beliefs. Therefore, such discussions are not a true exchange of ideas but rather a manifestation of ignorance. In situations where one party has no firm belief in the matter at hand, this may lead to a dilution of opinions, ultimately resulting in the disintegration of any belief whatsoever. In either case, such discussions are entirely pointless, as no one has ever been convinced through such methods. It is only in a rare few instances that such conversations lead to an exchange of attitudes, and these shifts may translate to real-world changes. These changes are neither inherently good nor bad but rather an extension of human existence, which may either exacerbate or alleviate suffering. Alan Watts aptly states that philosophical debates are ultimately between the partisans of structure and the partisans of ego, a notion that the author wholeheartedly endorses. The author's personal experience of debating, from which they developed the adage "A debate is like a cockfight; there's either a winner or no winners, every winner has won their pride but on the real ground, nothing is won," underscores the futility of debates and the illusion of victory.
